Colossal deal preserves land in Leverett, Shutesbury

W.D. Cows Co. sells development rights to Brushy Mountain

By NICK GRABBE

Leverett — A Texas developer of resort communities came to the W.D. Cows Co. to ask about the 5,000 acres it owns on Brushy Mountain east of Montague Road, president Cinda Jones recalled last week.

"They bought me the whole mountain," she said. "We laughed and said Leverett wouldn't like that and hung up." The company also recalled calls over the years from conservationists who wanted to protect the mountain by buying the development rights. Jones noted how attempts were made.

"We thought, 'Oh, that's not going to happen."

Future vision: Cinda Jones, president of W.D. Cows in Amherst, left, and Kristin DeBoer, executive director of Kestrel Land Trust, stand in front of Brushy Mountain in Leverett.

A view of Brushy Mountain in Leverett, part of a nearly 3,000-acre tract of land owned by W.D. Cows, is preserved from development. It is seen from Teawaddle Hill Road.

Land deal preserves property in Leverett and Shutesbury

Colossal deal preserves land in Leverett, Shutesbury

W.D. Cows Co. sells development rights to Brushy Mountain

By NICK GRABBE

Leverett — A Texas developer of resort communities came to the W.D. Cows Co. to ask about the 5,000 acres it owns on Brushy Mountain east of Montague Road, president Cinda Jones recalled last week.

"They bought me the whole mountain," she said. "We laughed and said Leverett wouldn't like that and hung up." The company also recalled calls over the years from conservationists who wanted to protect the mountain by buying the development rights. Jones noted how attempts were made.

"We thought, 'Oh, that's not going to happen."

Future vision: Cinda Jones, president of W.D. Cows in Amherst, left, and Kristin DeBoer, executive director of Kestrel Land Trust, stand in front of Brushy Mountain in Leverett.

A view of Brushy Mountain in Leverett, part of a nearly 3,000-acre tract of land owned by W.D. Cows, is preserved from development. It is seen from Teawaddle Hill Road.

Land deal preserves property in Leverett and Shutesbury

Colossal deal preserves land in Leverett, Shutesbury

W.D. Cows Co. sells development rights to Brushy Mountain

By NICK GRABBE

Leverett — A Texas developer of resort communities came to the W.D. Cows Co. to ask about the 5,000 acres it owns on Brushy Mountain east of Montague Road, president Cinda Jones recalled last week.

"They bought me the whole mountain," she said. "We laughed and said Leverett wouldn't like that and hung up." The company also recalled calls over the years from conservationists who wanted to protect the mountain by buying the development rights. Jones noted how attempts were made.

"We thought, 'Oh, that's not going to happen."

Future vision: Cinda Jones, president of W.D. Cows in Amherst, left, and Kristin DeBoer, executive director of Kestrel Land Trust, stand in front of Brushy Mountain in Leverett.

A view of Brushy Mountain in Leverett, part of a nearly 3,000-acre tract of land owned by W.D. Cows, is preserved from development. It is seen from Teawaddle Hill Road.